URBAN HERITAGE and SUSTAINABILITY

Organized by ICOMOS CIVVIH and ICOMOS-Korea

The urban heritage is a built environment of which forms and characteristics are shaped by the surrounding geo-cultural context. Geomorphology and civilization are closely associated with the position of a city, city planning principles, architectural typologies, and landscape of the city. The urban heritage is also a living environment for humans to collectively dwell, therefore its roles and functions are intimately related to social, cultural, and ethnic factors. Even when urban heritage has common morphologies and characteristics with each other, they reveal distinct identities. These differences are brought forth by interaction between tangible orders and intangible elements of the city.

From a historical perspective, every urban heritage with the exception of archaeological sites and ruins sustainably has led residents' lives in the city. Taking the form of a historic city, the urban heritage has creatively adapted to and actively accommodated diverse changes produced by the passage of time, accumulating a historical palimpsest of passing ages within it. Not all old cities become historic cities; a historic city has a rich reservoir of historical layers which embody the very value of urban heritage.

In this sense, it is not possible to separate tasks of preserving the significance of heritage and ensuring its sustainability. In particular, the urban heritage is closely related to transformations of the environment and the times, which makes the mission to ensure its sustainability all the more challenging. All of development pressure, tourism, and climate change are constant sources to threaten the urban heritage. A city can experience a boost for its identity and an enhancement of residents' living standards, when it maintains a mutually beneficial relationship with its urban heritage. By ensuring the city resilience, the urban heritage provides value which sustainably endures for generations, and which this generation should appreciate to conserve.

It is hoped that Scientific Symposium will serve as an arena in which the issues of urban heritage and its sustainability are emphasized, as well as relevant lessons and experiences are shared. The theme of Urban

Heritage and Sustainability is structured into following four sub-themes:

Sub-Title

- A-1 Management and Promotion of Urban Heritage in Historic Cities in Asian-Pacific Areas
- A-2 Management and Promotion of Urban Heritage in Historic Cities in Other Areas
- B-1 Sustainable Urban Development Issues in Historic Cities in Asian-Pacific Areas
- B-2 Sustainable Urban Development Issues in Historic Cities in Other Areas
